Operator Overloading

Overloading an Operator

Introduction

Operator overloading is the ability to tell the compiler how to perform a certain operation when its corresponding operator is used on one or more variables. For example, the compiler acts differently with regards to the subtraction operator "-" depending on how the operator is being used. When it is placed on the left of a numeric value such as -48, the compiler considers the number a negative value. When used between two integral values, such as 80-712, the compiler applies the subtraction operation. When used between an integer and a double-precision number, such as 558-9.27, the compiler subtracts the left number from the right number; the operation produces a double-precision number. When the - symbol is doubled and placed on one side of a variable, such as --Variable or Variable--, the value of the variable needs to be decremented; in other words, the value 1 shall be subtracted from it. All of these operations work because the subtraction operator "-" has been reconfigured in various classes to act appropriately.

Suppose you create a class named TCountry as follows:

```
//-------------------------------------------------------------------
struct TCountry
    string Name;
    Double Population;
    Extended Area;
    string Capital;
    Char Government;
```
